FOR Dr. Who and his companions the hazards of their recent adventures among the Romans were offset to some extent by the fact that they were at least dealing with human antagonists—a pleasant change after the Daleks. But at the end of last week's story, Tardis had hardly dematerialised from the Roman era before it became clear that things had gone radically wrong and unearthly influences were at work again. Observed the good Doctor: 'We seem to have been imprisoned by some kind of force. Something, somewhere, is slowly plucking us down.'

But what—and where to? In the first episode of 'The Web Planet' the time-travellers find themselves in eerie, alien surroundings not unlike the surface of the moon; and when Dr. Who attempts to take off again, the unknown force prevents Tardis from moving. It is impossible to tell whether a natural phenomenon is responsible, or some malevolent intelligence. So when Vicki is affected by a strange noise which only she can hear the Doctor and Ian set out to explore, leaving Barbara and Vicki behind. Making a totally unexpected discovery, and running into perils of a kind they have never encountered before, they return to tell the others—and get a most unpleasant shock.

Written by Bill Strutton and directed by Richard Martin, who was also responsible for the second Dalek serial, this latest story introduces some newcomers to the gallery of denizens of outer space met by the crew of Tardis since they first broke through the frontiers of time. For the Web Planet is by no means as deserted as it seems. The visitors from Earth are being closely watched...
